The plan should begin with the vulnerable population. Next, the essential workers at greatest risk of infection, such as health care workers and first responders, should follow. While the construction industry has gone to great lengths to protect its workers from the coronavirus, and it has been very largely successful, its workers merit priority over other essential workers who have the option of working remotely.

3. Ensure that Vaccination Distributions Do Not Lead to Needless Economic Disruptions.

AGC believes that both the public and public officials will require assurance that the distribution of vaccines will be rational, orderly, and relatively quick. Otherwise, they may overreact to the news that vaccines are available. AGC perceives that public officials may demand or require even
